QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Whether the United States by initiating an in rem forfeiture proceeding thereby submits itself to the in personam jurisdiction of the court for purposes of an appeal of the forfeiture?

2. Can the United States, as plaintiff in a forfeiture proceeding, destroy appellate jurisdiction and thereby prevent a property owner from obtaining review of a forfeiture judgment by removing the res from the district after a district court judgment is entered?

3. Whether the decision by the en banc court that it lacked jurisdiction in an appeal of the forfeiture of a $3.2 million Lear Jet, because the United States as plaintiff in the forfeiture action removed the aircraft from the district, conflicts with Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59 (1938), and the law of the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals?

4. Whether the principle of Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), is offended where the United States forfeits a claimant's only asset, thereby rendering it impecunious and unable to post a supersedeas bond, and thereafter defeats appellate jurisdiction concerning the forfeiture by removing the res from the district?

OPINIONS BELOW

On February 11, 1988, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit en banc entered a decision relating solely to its jurisdiction, finding it had no jurisdiction to consider Petitioner's appeal. (P.A. 45-57). On March 9, 1988, that court denied Petitioner's request for rehearing of its en banc decision (P.A. 79-80). The Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals on January 6, 1986, also dismissed for lack of jurisdiction Petitioner's appeal of the forfeiture taken in that Circuit after the res had been removed there. (P.A. 81) Only the en banc opinion is reported. 836 F.2d 1571 (1988).

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

On April 24, 1987, Petitioner filed a Petition for Certiorari seeking review of the judgment of the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit on significant issues of forfeiture law that relate closely to the issues under consideration in Kungys v. United States, No. 86-228. The Petition is still pending before this Court. On October 2, 1987, the Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit sua sponte granted rehearing en banc, thereby vacating the panel opinion that is the subject of that Petition for Certiorari. On February 11, 1988, the en banc court found it lacked jurisdiction over the forfeiture appeal because the government had removed the res from the district. On March 17, 1988, Petitioner filed a Supplement to its Petition for Certiorari raising several significant questions concerning the lower court's jurisdictional determinations. This Petition for Writ of Certiorari is filed in an abundance of caution in the event this Court does not grant certiorari under the first and supplemental petitions. This Court should grant certiorari to consider the jurisdictional questions raised in this Petition and should then consider the significant forfeiture law issues raised in the initial Petition.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

On January 19, 1981, the United States as plaintiff filed a forfeiture complaint in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida. It did not assert admiralty jurisdiction; instead it asserted jurisdiction pursuant to 8 U.S.C. § 1329 and 28 U.S.C. §§ 1345 and 1355. (R. 1-1; 2 P.C.A. 17; D.E. 1).[1]

The Plaintiff United States asserted that the "aircraft is forfeited" and requested that the court issue an order "to enforce the forfeiture" and to "deliver into the possession of the Immigration and Naturalization Service" the aircraft "and for such other and further relief as this Court may deem just and proper." (R. 1-7).

Plaintiff not only arrested the aircraft in rem (D.E. 3), but personally served the Defendant/Claimant Leybda Corporation ("Leybda") through its counsel, Richard Baron (D.E. 2, 8; 2 P.C.A. 67, 71). Leybda as a Defendant/owner answered the complaint. (D.E. 9; 2 P.C.A. 28-29, 30-40). Thereafter, and throughout the pretrial and trial portion of this case, Leybda was treated as a defendant. (See, e.g., D.E. 7, 12, 52, 68, 75, 141). In its Order of October 12, 1982, the District Court specifically addressed this issue and found that "Leybda Corporation is viewed as a defendant in this cause." (Order of October 12, 1982, at D.E. 75; 2 P.C.A. 72-73).

On September 12, 1985, the District Court entered a judgment of forfeiture in favor of the government. (P.A. 23-38). After the entry of the adverse final judgment, Leybda submitted a motion for new trial to the District Court[2] and a motion to recover attorneys' fees and costs

[1] In this Supplement to Petition for Writ of Certiorari the Record on Appeal will be referred to under the designation "R.-volume-page"; Petitioner's Appendix to Petition and Supplemental Petition before this Court will be referred to as "P.A."; Petitioner's citation to P.A. 1-44 refers to its Appendix in its original Petition filed April 24, 1987; Petitioner's Appendix to its Brief in the original Appeal in the Eleventh Circuit will be referred to as "P.C.A."; Petitioner's Appendix before the Eleventh Circuit en banc will be referred to as "2 P.C.A."; and Docket Entries will be referred to as "D.E.".

[2] The motion was based upon documents obtained from the Lear Jet crew demonstrating that the United States Embassy in Managua, Nicaragua had subsequently issued new visas to the crew members. The motion asserted that issuance of the new visas to the crew members after all alleged derogatory facts were known revealed beyond doubt that their original alleged misrepresentations could not have been material misrepresentations warranting forfeiture. (D.E. 345).

relating to the counts that it had prevailed on at trial. (D.E. 347, 348, 349). During the pendency of these motions and without explanation or justification, the government removed the aircraft to Missouri. Seventeen days after the aircraft had been removed to Missouri, the government responded to the pending motions without raising in its responses any question as to the court's continued jurisdiction. (P.A. 70-71; D.E. 351, 352, 353; 2 P.C.A. 75-103).

The judgment of the District Court was appealed by Petitioner's timely notice of appeal filed on October 11, 1985. (R. 10-346). Prior to filing the appeal, Leybda did not seek a stay of the transfer of the airplane because such a request would have been futile in view of Leybda's lack of assets to post the supersedeas bond[3] required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 62(d). (P.A. 58). See also Fed. R. Civ. P. 62(b).

Upon learning that the aircraft had been moved to the Eighth Circuit, Leybda filed a notice of appeal in that Circuit. (R. 10-355). The government vigorously challenged the jurisdiction of the Eighth Circuit, asserting that it had "no authority to entertain a motion relating to an appeal pending in another Circuit." (United States' Emergency Response in Opposition to Appellants' Emergency Motion to Stay Transfer or Sale, 2 P.C.A. 100-103). On January 6, 1986, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals dismissed Leybda's appeal for lack of Jurisdiction. (P.A. 81).

On January 23, 1987, a panel of the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals, following oral argument found that it had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. United States v. One Lear Jet Aircraft, 808 F.2d 765, 768-69 (11th Cir. 1987).

[3] The record on appeal before the court below demonstrates unequivocally that Leybda had no assets to post a supersedeas bond. (P.C.A. 181-185; R. 7-243; R. 10-252 n.1). Thus, the extremely speculative supposition referred to in the third paragraph of a footnote in the majority's opinion below that Leybda may have had access to other assets, see P.A. 50 n.1 ¶ 3 ("as the government alleges . . . [I]f this allegation is true . . . ."), is totally without basis. See Leybda's Petition for Rehearing En Banc.

(P.A. 6-9). The court subsequently denied rehearing and rehearing en banc on Leybda's motion to review the merits of the panel opinion. (P.A. 39).

Leybda filed its Petition for Certiorari on April 24, 1987. The Solicitor General on July 24, 1987, agreed with Leybda's position that the case should be held pending resolution of Kungys v. United States, No. 86-228, which was set for reargument. 107 S.Ct. 3258 (1987). That Petition for Certiorari is pending before the Court at this time.

On October 2, 1987, seven months after the court of appeals denied rehearing en banc, the court sua sponte granted rehearing en banc solely on the question of jurisdiction, and vacated the panel opinion. 831 F.2d 221 (11th Cir. 1987) (P.A. 75-76); Letter from Clerk (P.A. 77-78).

On February 11, 1988, the Eleventh Circuit en banc in a 6-to-5 decision held that it lacked jurisdiction to hear Leybda's appeal because the removal of the aircraft by the government from the district destroyed the court's in rem jurisdiction. (P.A. 45-74). On February 24, 1988, Leybda petitioned for rehearing en banc, which was denied by the court on March 9, 1988. (P.A. 79-80). On March 17, 1988 Leybda filed a Supplement to its Petition which addresses issues identical to those raised herein.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

I. Certiorari Should Be Granted To Consider Important Questions Concerning The Availability Of Appellate Jurisdiction In Forfeiture Proceedings.

The en banc Court below, by a 6-to-5 vote, held that jurisdiction over the appeal of a forfeiture action initiated by the government may be defeated by the simple expedient of the government's removal of the res from the judicial district. The majority below thereby permitted the Executive Branch to deprive the owner of a $3.2 million aircraft of any appellate review of the government's forfeiture thereof by removing the aircraft from the district before an appeal could be filed. By viewing the issue solely through the lens of in rem jurisdiction, the court below overlooked the fact that by initiating a forfeiture proceeding the government thereby submitted itself to the in personam jurisdiction of the court. See Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59 (1938).

The significance of this jurisdictional issue is manifest. Not only will it recur frequently in forfeiture litigation,[4] but it can be anticipated that the decision of the court below will give the government an all-to-easy way to defeat appellate jurisdiction by removing the res from the district for no reason other than to obtain dismissal of an appeal.

Indeed, this principle would allow the government not only to frustrate appellate jurisdiction, but trial court jurisdiction as well. The government could do this by obtaining possession of the res through pre-judgment seizure upon filing of the forfeiture complaint, removing it from the district, and then asserting lack of jurisdiction in the district court in order to defeat a claimant's day in court. If jurisdiction over forfeitures can only be in rem, requiring presence of the res in the district, the government can thereby forum shop at will, or in the alternative, play a bizarre game of musical chairs with a claimant seeking to contest forfeiture.[5] This is an important question of federal law which has not been, but should be, settled by this Court.

[4] For Fiscal Year October 1, 1985 to September 30, 1986 three thousand five hundred forty-six (3,546) civil forfeiture actions were filed in the federal district courts. For Fiscal Year October 1, 1986 to September 30, 1987 three thousand five hundred fifty-two (3,552) civil forfeiture actions were filed in the district courts. Telephone conversations with David Gentry, Statistical Analysis and Reporting Division of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, March 10, 1988.

[5] Indeed this is precisely what the government did here on the appellate level. When Petitioner filed its notice of appeal in the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, where the res had been moved to, the government successfully opposed appellate jurisdiction there, and simultaneously opposed jurisdiction in the Eleventh Circuit.

The decision below applies antiquated and questionable principles of in rem admiralty jurisdiction in the context of forfeitures initiated by the government. As the dissent en banc noted, the majority resuscitated "an anachronistic and conceptually flawed rule of admiralty, and appl[ied] it to a modern forfeiture case where it does not belong." (P.A. 65). Whether the courts should apply hypertechnical in rem jurisdiction notions in modern day forfeiture proceedings presents a significant and recurring problem that this Court has never addressed.

Under Article III of the Constitution, the Congress is given plenary authority to define the jurisdiction of the appellate courts. The decision below in effect gives the Executive Branch the option to defeat Congress' judgment with regard to appellate jurisdiction through its unilateral action in removing the res in a forfeiture case. This holding raises grave concerns for the administration of justice, for the appearance of justice, and for the vitality of the principle of separation of powers. Certiorari should accordingly be granted to resolve these significant and recurring issues of federal jurisdiction.

II. The En Banc Court Of Appeals' Decision Conflicts With This Court's Decision In Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59 (1938), And Also Directly Conflicts With The Law In The Fifth Circuit Court Of Appeals.

The decision of the en banc court, rejecting appellate jurisdiction despite the initiation of the forfeiture proceedings by the government as plaintiff, conflicts with this Court's decision in Adam v. Saenger 303 U.S. 59 (1938). Adam recognizes the principle that where a party invokes the jurisdiction of a court, it thereby submits itself to the full in personam jurisdiction of that court. 303 U.S. at 67-68. In Adam, this Court found that a plaintiff, although a non-resident of the forum state, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court in personam for purposes of a cross-action (counter-claim) by initially invoking the jurisdiction of the court as plaintiff. This Court held that "[t]he plaintiff having, by this voluntary act in demanding justice from the defendant, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, there is nothing arbitrary or unreasonable in treating him as being there for all purposes for which justice to the defendant requires his presence." 303 U.S. at 67-68. Because under the principle of Adam v. Saenger, the court of appeals had jurisdiction over the person of the government, it could order it to reconvey and return the res to the claimant, the relief sought on appeal, notwithstanding the absence of the res from the district.

The en banc court's decision also conflicts with the law of the Fifth Circuit, which has recognized the applicability of the principle of Adam v. Saenger in in rem admiralty cases. Inland Credit Corp. v. M/T Bow Egret, 552 F.2d 1148 (5th Cir. 1977). In Inland, the Fifth Circuit held that a plaintiff which had invoked the jurisdiction of the court could not claim that an appeal should be dismissed because the court failed to retain control over the res. Quoting Adam, the court concluded that "it is proper for us to exercise our jurisdiction in personam to correct any errors in the lower court's in rem adjudication." 552 F.2d at 1152.

Not only did the government in this case invoke the jurisdiction of the court in initiating the forfeiture proceeding, but it also continued to invoke that jurisdiction after the res had been removed by the custodian to another district. (D.E. 351-53, 362). In this respect, the court below's decision also conflicts with another decision of the Fifth Circuit, United States v. An Article of Drugs Consisting of 4,680 Bales, 725 F.2d 976 (5th Cir. 1984).

The decision of the court below applies hypertechnical and outmoded notions of in rem admiralty jurisdiction inappropriately in a forfeiture context in which the government as plaintiff had invoked the court's jurisdiction. In so doing it also conflicts in principle with Shaffer v. Heitner, 433 U.S. 186 (1977). In Shaffer this Court clearly rejected the rigid view of jurisdiction long associated with Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U.S. 714 (1878), establishing instead that "the standard of fairness and substantial justice set forth in International Shoe should be held to govern actions in rem as well as in personam." 433 U.S. at 206. It is only through a strained legal fiction that the court's jurisdiction can somehow be said to disappear when the res in an in rem action is removed from the district, even though the parties having an interest in and control over the res are present and subject to the court's jurisdiction. Like the fiction on which Pennoyer was based, this one "supports an ancient form without substantial modern justification." Shaffer, 433 U.S. at 212. As a result, the fiction should not be employed to substitute for analysis, to mock reality and to perpetuate injustice. See generally L. Fuller, Legal Fictions 10, 70-71 (1967).

The majority below's view of in rem jurisdiction was also rejected by this Court in Continental Grain Co. v. Barge FBL-585, 364 U.S. 19 (1960). In Continental Grain, this Court recognized that an in rem action could be transferred to a district other than the one in which the res is situated, noting that "a fiction born to provide convenient forums should not be transferred into a weapon to defeat that very purpose." 364 U.S. at 23. In this case the res is still intact, has not been sold, is within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and is within the custody of the government, over which the court has in personam jurisdiction. As a result, principles of in rem jurisdiction should not be permitted to be perverted to transform a fiction designed to provide a convenient forum "into a weapon to defeat that very purpose." Id.

Thus, the en banc majority's opinion "offends fundamental principles of fairness, . . . represents a departure from common sense, . . . [and] is analytically flawed." (P.A. 58) (dissent of Vance, J., joined by Hatchett & Anderson, J.J.).

III. The En Banc Court's Decision Is In Conflict With Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), And Its Progeny.

In this case Leybda, the Claimant/Appellant, as a result of the forfeiture of its airplane by the United States, was without financial resources to post a supersedeas bond as required by Fed. R. Civ. P. 62(d) for the obtaining of a stay pending appeal. (2 P.C.A. 181-85). In view of this lack of financial resources necessary to obtain a stay, the court below's holding that the government's removal of the res from the district defeats appellate jurisdiction over a forfeiture action also offends basic principles of Due Process and Equal Protection applied in Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), and its progeny.

Griffin held that under the Equal Protection and Due Process Clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, a state may not deny a free transcript to an indigent criminal defendant where the transcript is necessary for a direct appeal from his conviction. This Court concluded that "[t]here can be no equal justice where the kind of a trial a man gets depends on the amount of money he has. Destitute defendants must be afforded as adequate appellate review as defendants who have money enough to buy transcripts." 351 U.S. at 19. Griffin has been followed in a long line of cases decided by this Court.[6]

These cases in the criminal context "have made clear that differences in access to the instruments needed to vindicate legal rights, when based upon the financial situation of the defendant, are repugnant to the Constitution." Roberts v. LaVallee, 389 U.S. at 42. The Griffin principle, which has been extended beyond the criminal process, see Boddie v. Connecticut, 401 U.S. 371 (1971), "stands for the proposition that a state cannot arbitrarily cut off appeal rights for indigents while leaving open avenues of appeal for more affluent persons." Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600, 607 (1974).

[6] See Gardner v. California, 393 U.S. 367 (1969); Roberts v. LaVallee, 389 U.S. 40 (1967); Long v. District Court of Iowa, 385 U.S. 192 (1966); Rinaldi v. Yaeger, 384 U.S. 305 (1966); Draper v. Washington, 372 U.S. 487 (1963); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Lane v. Brown, 372 U.S. 477 (1963); Coppedge v. United States, 369 U.S. 438 (1962); Smith v. Bennett, 365 U.S. 708 (1961); Burns v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 252 (1959); Eskridge v. Washington State Board of Prison Terms & Paroles, 357 U.S. 214 (1958).

These Due Process and Equal Protection principles should apply as well here to a forfeiture involving a substantial asset—a $3.2 million airplane which represented virtually the entire assets of the corporation—particularly in view of the quasi-criminal nature of forefeitures. See One Plymouth Sedan v. Pennsylvania, 380 U.S. 693, 697, 702 (1965) ("the information, though technically a civil proceeding, is in substance and effect a criminal one"); United States v. One 1936 Model Ford V8 Deluxe Coach, 307 U.S. 219, 226 (1939).

The forfeiture context involved here presents not merely a party whose indigency renders it unable to pursue appellate rights; its indigency and resulting inability to pursue appellate rights is produced by the action of the government itself in seeking and obtaining the forfeiture of the company's only asset. Certiorari should accordingly be granted to consider whether the Griffin principle would be offended by a decision that the government, after rendering a company impecunious through its forfeiture action, may then defeat appellate jurisdiction concerning the forfeiture merely by the expedient of removing the res from the district.

CONCLUSION

This case presents questions of fundamental importance concering the jurisdiction of federal courts in forfeiture proceedings. Certiorari should be granted to consider these significant jurisdictional issues never previously addressed by this Court, and to resolve a conflict between the decision below and the jurisdictional principles established in Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59 (1938), as well as the law of the Fifth Circuit. In addition, certiorari should be granted to resolve whether the principle of Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956), is applicable in the quasi-criminal forfeiture context.

UNITED STATES of America,
Plaintiff-Appellee,

v.

ONE LEAR JET AIRCRAFT, SERIAL NO. 35A-280, REGISTRATION NO. YN-BVO, Defendant, Leybda Corp., Claimant-Appellant.

No. 85-5938.

United States Court of Appeals,
Eleventh Circuit.

Feb. 11, 1988.

Action was brought for forfeiture of aircraft. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, No. 81-6031-CIV-LCN, Lenore Carrero Nesbitt, J., 617 F.Supp. 769, upheld forfeiture, and aircraft's owner appealed. The Court of Appeals, 808 F.2d 765, affirmed. Following vacation of opinion by full court, which ordered en banc reconsideration of in rem jurisdictional issue, 831 F.2d 221, the Court of Appeals, Johnson, Circuit Judge, held that removal of aircraft from jurisdiction destroyed in rem jurisdiction.

Appeal dismissed.

Vance, Circuit Judge, filed dissenting opinion in which Hatchett and Anderson, Circuit Judges, joined.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida.

Before RONEY, Chief Judge, TJOFLAT, HILL, FAY, VANCE, KRAVITCH, JOHNSON, HATCHETT, ANDERSON, CLARK and EDMONDSON, Circuit Judges.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge:

This case involves a forfeiture proceeding initiated by the government against a Lear Jet under 8 U.S.C.A. § 1324 (b). The aircraft had been used to enter this country by persons who made material misrepresentations on their visa applications. Leybda Corporation intervened as a claimant to the plane, but after trial, the district court ruled that the aircraft was forfeited to the government. United States v. One Lear Jet Aircraft, 617 F.Supp. 769 (S.D.Fla.1985). Leybda did not file a stay of judgment with the district court or a supersedeas bond with the appellate court. Therefore, after the expiration of the automatic ten day stay provided by Fed.R.Civ.P. 62(a), the government removed the plane to a warehouse in Missouri. Leybda then filed a timely notice of appeal, and this Court affirmed the forfeiture judgment. United States v. One Lear Jet Aircraft, 808 F.2d 765 (11th Cir. 1987). The panel held that it had jurisdiction to entertain this appeal even though the aircraft had been removed from the Court's territorial jurisdiction. This opinion was vacated by the full Court, which ordered in banc reconsideration of the in rem jurisdictional issue. 831 F.2d 221 (11th Cir.1987). We now hold that, because removal of the res from a court's territorial jurisdiction destroys that court's in rem jurisdiction, Pennington v. Fourth National Bank, 243 U.S. 269, 37 S.Ct. 282, 61 L.Ed. 713 (1917), this Court does not have jurisdiction to hear Leybda's appeal.

The general rule of in rem jurisdiction is that the court's power derives entirely from its control over the defendant res. Id. at 272, 37 S.Ct. at 283; L.B. Harvey Marine, Inc. v. M/V River Arc, 712 F.2d 458, 459 (11th Cir.1983). Where an appellant fails to file a stay of judgment or a supersedeas bond, and the res is removed from the court's territorial jurisdiction, the appellate court does not have in rem jurisdiction. Taylor v. Tracor Marine, Inc., 683 F.2d 1361, 1362 (11th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1012, 103 S.Ct. 1252, 75 L.Ed.2d 481 (1983); Parks v. B.F. Leaman & Sons, Inc., 279 F.2d 529, 532 (5th Cir. 1960). This Circuit has recently reaffirmed this traditional rule. See Harvey Marine, 712 F.2d at 459; Taylor, 683 F.2d at 1362.

In Harvey Marine and Taylor, this Court dismissed appeals for lack of jurisdiction where the prevailing party had removed the res and where the losing claimants failed to stay the execution of the district court's order. Recent cases in other circuits have reached the same result. See, e.g., United States v. $79,000 in U.S. Currency, 801 F.2d 738, 739 (5th Cir.1986) ("Where no supersedeas is filed or steps taken to supersede judgment and the Marshal surrenders custody, neither the district court nor the appellate court retains in rem jurisdiction"); United States v. 66 Pieces of Jade & Gold Jewelry, 760 F.2d 970, 973 (9th Cir.1985) ("Because forfeiture proceedings are in rem, the court's subject matter jurisdiction is dependent on its continuing control over the property"); Bank of New Orleans & Trust Co. v. Marine Credit Corp., 583 F.2d 1063, 1068 (8th Cir.1978) ("Removal of the res from a court's jurisdiction, or distribution of a substitute res deposited in the registry of the court, destroys in rem jurisdiction"). These cases demonstrate that the traditional in rem rule retains vitality.

In Harvey Marine, this Court dismissed an appeal as moot where the ship against which an in rem action had been brought departed the Court's jurisdiction after the district court dissolved the in rem arrest warrant. 712 F.2d at 459. Harvey Marine had filed an appeal from the district court's order dissolving the arrest, but it failed to request a stay of that order and it did not file a supersedeas bond. Id. at 458. This Court stated that it could not "proceed to adjudication" where the res was no longer within the Court's territorial jurisdiction. In response to Harvey Marine's argument that it was "fundamentally unfair not to adjudicate the merits of the case," the Court noted that there were "various methods to protect appellate jurisdiction in an in rem case," id. at 459 (citing Bank of New Orleans, 583 F.2d at 1068-69; Parks, 279 F.2d 529), and it implied that Harvey Marine was at fault for failing to employ any of these methods.

Other courts have stated this position more forcefully, holding that the losing claimant to the res is obligated to take some action to preserve the res so that the parties' rights to it could be adjudicated at the district and appellate courts. These courts impose a duty on the claimant to seek a stay of execution of the district court's judgment pending appeal, to file a supersedeas bond, or to take other action to preserve the res. Bank of New Orleans, 583 F.2d at 1068. See also United States v. $57,480.05 in U.S. Currency and Other Coins, 722 F.2d 1457, 1458-59 (9th Cir.1984). Under these circumstances, a claimant who fails to act to preserve the res cannot complain when the appellate court dismisses his appeal for lack of in rem jurisdiction.

Taylor employs an analysis similar to that in Harvey Marine, and the cases reach similar results. In Taylor, crew members brought an action against their vessel to obtain their wages. The ship was seized and sold, but the proceeds were disbursed to priority lienholders. This Court noted that the crew members failed to seek a stay of the district court's order allowing disbursement of the funds; therefore, the res was not before the Court on appeal, 683 F.2d at 1362. Consequently, in rem jurisdiction was destroyed, rendering the crew's appeal moot. Id.

Our recent cases control the result in the case at bar. The present case involves a sequence of events which is similar to what occurred in Taylor and Harvey Marine. After trial below, the district court ordered the plane forfeited to the government. Leybda filed notice of appeal, but it failed to stay the district court's order.[1] Therefore,

1. Judge Vance contends that the result in this case is egregious because Leybda had no funds with which to post a bond to stay the judgment. He states that "[h]ad [Leybda] been able to post a supersedeas bond, the appeal would have gone forward without jurisdictional question." Our reading of the record does not support this assertion. Nothing in the record suggests that Leybda ever indicated to the trial court that it was not moving for a stay because it had no assets with which to post a bond. Moreover, a review of the record does not suggest that Leybda would have posted a bond even if it had sufficient assets.

In Leybda's reply brief submitted to the panel of this Court, Leybda stated that it "did not need to seek a stay

the judgment became final ten days after the court issued its decree, and the government was free to remove the plane from this Court's jurisdiction. That removal destroyed in rem jurisdiction.[2] because the court had continuing in personam jurisdiction. Moreover, a motion for a stay would have been futile. Leybda has no assets to post a stay." Appellant's Reply Brief at 6. In its in banc brief, Leybda reasserted the futility of seeking a stay. Appellant's In Banc Brief at 17. The language employed in these briefs demonstrates that impecuniousness was not the reason behind Leybda's failing to seek a stay. Instead, we find that Leybda's initial statement that it believed that it "did not need to seek a stay" explains Leybda's failure to take action.

In addition, the record is not clear on the issue of Leybda's access to funds. Leybda cites a corporate officer's affidavit as proof that the corporation's only major asset was the Lear Jet. R 7-243. However, the government alleged that Leybda was a sham corporation established as a commercial cover for the Cuban government. R 10-252 n. 1. If this latter allegation is true, Leybda may have had access to Cuban government funds. Moreover, this may explain how Leybda's attorney will be recompensed for the more than $41,000 worth of costs and fees he had incurred on behalf of this defunct corporation. See R 10-348 & 349.

2. Leybda asserts that the government's removal of the aircraft was improper because it was done solely to eliminate this Court's in rem jurisdiction. Accidental, fraudulent, or improper removal of the res does not destroy in rem jurisdiction. The Rio Grande, 90 U.S. (23 Wall) 458, 23 L.Ed. 158 (1874). However, after the expiration of the automatic ten day stay provided in Fed.R.Civ.P. 62(a) and absent a stay pending appeal, a prevailing plaintiff is free to execute a judgment in his favor even though the defendant is pursuing an appeal. See United States v. Verlinsky, 459 F.2d 1085, 1089 (5th Cir. 1972).

In the present case, Leybda did not request a stay, and neither the district court nor this Court stayed the judgment

In light of the in rem jurisdictional rule, the only way in which Leybda might avoid dismissal of its appeal is to fit this appeal within the Court's in personam jurisdiction. Precedent from the predecessor to this Court holds that when an original action was brought in rem and in personam, the court retained jurisdiction even after the res was removed from the jurisdiction. Inland Credit Corp. v. M/T Bow Egret, 552 F.2d 1148 (5th Cir.1977). Therefore, this Court must determine whether in personam jurisdiction existed in this case.

One might argue that jurisdiction in this case was not limited to in rem jurisdiction. For example, 28 U.S.C.A. § 1345 provides that:

> Except as otherwise provided by Act of Congress, the district courts shall have original jurisdiction of all civil actions, suits or proceedings commenced by the United States, or by any agency or officer thereof expressly authorized to sue by Act of Congress.

In addition, 28 U.S.C.A. § 1355 provides that:

> The district court shall have original jurisdiction, exclusive of the courts of the states, of any action or proceeding for the recovery or enforcement of any fine, penalty, or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise, incurred under any Act of Congress, except matters within the jurisdiction of the Court of International Trade under Section 1582 of this title.

sua sponte. Thus, ten days after the district court issued its decree, the government was entitled to do what it wished with the jet. See $79,000, 801 F.2d at 740 (The government's removal of forfeited property after the expiration of the ten day stay did not fall within the Rio Grande exception where the losing claimant failed to stay the district court's judgment). In this situation, the removal of the aircraft to Missouri was not improper.

In its forfeiture complaint, the government alleged that 28 U.S.C.A. §§ 1345 & 1355 provided the district court with jurisdiction, and the district court proceeded with the complaint on that basis. One Lear Jet, 617 F.Supp. at 771. At first glance, Section 1345 (jurisdiction where the United States is a plaintiff) may be read to provide a jurisdictional basis that is independent of the presence of the res.[3]

However, a closer examination of these sections indicates that they vest the district courts with subject matter jurisdiction over forfeitures under 8 U.S.C.A. § 1324. This is irrelevant to the question of whether the panel had in rem or in personam jurisdiction to decide this appeal. In addition, the statute governing forfeitures under the customs laws suggests that these statutes do not supply an independent jurisdictional basis. In part, the customs laws state that, "the storage of property outside the judicial district or customs collection district in which it was seized shall in no way affect the jurisdiction of the court which would otherwise have jurisdiction over such property." 19 U.S.C.A. § 1605. The legislative history of Section 1605 states that the statute was necessary to modify the traditional rule that the res "remain in the judicial district of seizure in order that the district court may have

3. The only statutory provision which requires the res to be before the court is 28 U.S.C.A. § 1395(b), which provides:

> A civil proceeding for the forfeiture of property may be prosecuted in any district where such property is found.

However, this section concerns venue, not jurisdiction. Therefore, it does not limit a court's authortiy to adjudicate forfeitures under Section 1324.

jurisdiction when condemnation proceedings are instituted." 1954 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 3900, 3906. The provisions of Title 28 discussed above were in effect when Congress adopted Section 1605. If those provisions were intended to eliminate the traditional requirement that the res be within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, Section 1605 was unnecessary. Obviously, the drafters of Section 1605 did not subscribe to this view.[4]

Although there is no statutory basis on which to assert that this Court has in personam jurisdiction, a limited exception to the in rem rule allows a court to retain jurisdiction even though the res is no longer within the court's territorial boundaries.[5] Specifically, where there is an

4. In the exercise of its regulatory powers, Congress could modify the requirement that the res be within the court's territorial jurisdiction, as long as the claimants were not denied due process. In fact, one district court has stated that, in the absence of a contrary congressional intent, the territorial jurisdiction of a court in a forfeiture proceeding under 28 U.S.C.A. § 1355 is limited only by the territorial limits of the nation and the venue requirements of 28 U.S.C.A. § 1395. United States v. One 1974 Cessna Model 310R Aircraft, 432 F.Supp. 364, 368 (D.S.C.1977). There is no support for this conclusion and we decline to adopt it, especially in light of the legislative history to 19 U.S.C.A. § 1605.

5. Judge Clark's dissent quotes from Continental Grain Co. v. Barge FBL-585, 364 U.S. 19, 80 S.Ct. 1470, 4 L.Ed.2d 1540 (1960), to support the proposition that the absence of the res should not defeat this Court's jurisdiction. However, as Judge Clark notes, Continental Grain involved an action which had been brought both in rem and in personam. There was an "interface" of the two types of jurisdiction; therefore, the Court could maintain in personam jurisdiction over the parties even after the res was removed from the jurisdiction. Reliance on Continental Grain is unavailing in the present case where such an interface of in rem and in personam jur-

"interface of in rem and in personam jurisdiction," a court may properly exercise broad in personam power over the parties to the in rem action. Inland Credit, 552 F.2d at 1152. However, precedent in this Court provides little support for the claim that Leyba's appeal falls within this limited category of exceptions.

Factually, Inland Credit is different from the present case. In Inland Credit, a ship mortgagee brought an in rem action against the ship and an in personam action against the ship's owner. By so doing, the plaintiff invoked both types of jurisdiction. In One Lear Jet, the government never invoked in personam jurisdiction when it brought suit; it sued the plane, not the purported-owner who later intervened.[6] isdiction does not exist. In this case, the Court cannot assert in personam jurisdiction over the government because the action was solely in rem. We recognized this in Taylor where we dismissed an in rem action on appeal but noted that, if "this case also involved claims in personam, jurisdiction might still lie," 683 F.2d at 1362 n. 2. It follows from this comment that there is no basis for in personam jurisdiction when an action does not involve in personam claims. This is the situation here.

6. Judge Vance accuses the majority of misreading Inland Credit because the Inland Credit Court stated that it was "undeniable that [the plaintiff] Inland was subject to this court's in personam jurisdiction." However, Judge Vance fails to indicate that the Fifth Circuit had provided two reasons for finding in personam jurisdiction in Inland Credit. In two sentences just prior to the statement quoted by Judge Vance, the Court emphasized that (1) Inland had filed the suit both in rem and in personam, and (2) that Inland had appealed to the Fifth Circuit in an attempt to recapture a part of another party's in personam recovery. 552 F.2d at 1152. From this, the Court concluded that it had in personam jurisdiction over Inland. Id. However, this does not mean that an appellate court has in personam jurisdiction over a plaintiff who merely brings an in rem action in the district court.

Other cases which embody exceptions to the in rem jurisdictional rule are also distinguishable. In Treasure Salvors, Inc. v. Unidentified Wrecked and Abandoned Sailing Vessel, 569 F.2d 330 (5th Cir.1978), a Florida corporation sued for possession of artifacts from a sunken ship located partially within and partially outside the territorial waters of the United States. The United States intervened in the district court and appealed summary judgment in the corporation's favor, arguing that the district court lacked in rem jurisdiction to determine the rights of the parties. The Court held that by intervening as a party defendant/claimant, and by stipulating to the district court's admiralty jurisdiction, the United States had waived the requirement that the res be before the court. Id. at 335. Again, this case is different from One Lear Jet because jurisdiction in One Lear Jet was based solely on the res; the government did not consent to the court's in personam jurisdiction.[7] It merely brought a forfeiture action against the aircraft.

This Court's precedents do not allow us to assert in personam jurisdiction over the government in this case. Such a holding would be an unwarranted extension of the limited exceptions which find in personam jurisdiction in

7. In criticizing the majority's discussion of Treasure Salvors, Judge Vance ignores the fact that the parties in Treasure Salvors consented to the district court's exercise of in rem jurisdiction, but the losing party subsequently challenged that court's jurisdiction on appeal. The case at bar is different because the government is challenging this Court's jurisdiction, to which it never consented. Subsequent cases have deemed this consent issue to be significant. See Harvey Marine, 712 F.2d at 459; Treasure Salvors v. Unidentified Wrecked and Abandoned Sailing Vessel, 640 F.2d 560, 566 (5th Cir. Mar. 1981) ("Treasure Salvors III").

certain forfeiture proceedings. Moreover, we reject the notion that the United States consented to in personam jurisdiction by invoking the district court's in rem jurisdiction initially.[8] To hold that the government "consented" to in personam jurisdiction would be tantamount to deciding that a court has in personam jurisdiction over any participant in an in rem proceeding. This does not comport with the traditional analysis of in rem jurisdiction.[9]

8. Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59, 58 S.Ct. 454, 82 L.Ed. 649 (1938), provides no support for the proposition that the government consented to the personal jurisdiction of the court simply by bringing this action. Adam held that the Fourteenth Amendment allows states to authorize the service of process of a defendant's counterclaim (referred to as a cross-complaint in Adam) upon a plaintiff's counsel of record as a condition of allowing the plaintiff access to a state court. Id. at 67-68, 58 S.Ct. at 458. It does not state that in personam jurisdiction exists simply because a plaintiff brings a claim in rem. At best, Adam supports a holding that the government would be subject to an in personam counterclaim brought by Leybda against the government. In the present case, no such counterclaim was filed. In November 1983, Leybda filed a pleading in response to the government's amended complaint. This pleading was styled "Amended Answer, Affirmative Defenses and Cross-Claim," and it included a third party cross-claim against Management Jets International. Leybda's third party action was severed from this in rem action and transferred to district court in Nebraska. R3-137. The claim was subsequently dismissed. Appellant's In Banc Brief at 3. This cross-claim was a different lawsuit from the government's in rem complaint; therefore, it cannot provide in personam jurisdiction over the government in the case at bar.

9. A recent Fifth Circuit opinion held that a "substitute basis of in personam jurisdiction" existed in a forfeiture action brought by the government against a drug. United States v. An Article of Drug Consisting of 4,680 Pails, More or Less,

In sum, this Court lacks in rem jurisdiction to hear this appeal because the res had been removed from the jurisdiction at the time of the appeal. In addition, the Court does not have in personam jurisdiction over the parties because the action was solely in rem. Because this Court lacks jurisdiction to hear this appeal, it cannot entertain Leybda's claims on the merits. Accordingly, the appeal is DISMISSED.

VANCE, Circuit Judge, dissenting, in which HATCHETT and ANDERSON, Circuit Judges, join:

I concur in Judge Clark's dissent. I write separately to accent a few points I consider particularly important.

The question that divides the in banc court involves only the right of appeal. Because the panel correctly decided the merits of the case the outcome is not affected. In addition, my views are not in any way critical of the

Each Pail Consisting of 60 Packets, 725 F.2d 976, 982 (5th Cir.1984). In that case, the manufacturer intervened and judgment was entered in its favor. Subsequently, the drug was released to the manufacturer who removed it from the district. After the government's motion for a new trial was granted, the manufacturer moved to dismiss for lack of in rem jurisdiction. However, the court held that it had a "substitute basis" of jurisdiction because the manufacturer had voluntarily appeared before the court to oppose the new trial motion but had not contested the in rem jurisdiction of the court at that time. Id. at 984.

As far as An Article of Drug is indistinguishable from the present case, we decline to follow it because precedent in this Circuit does not support this holding. We refuse to supply a "substitute basis" of jurisdiction in order to expand this Court's jurisdiction, especially where Leybda could have preserved the Court's in rem jurisdiction simply by filing a supersedeas bond.

government because of its removal of the aircraft from the Southern District of Florida. Because the judgment of forfeiture was neither superseded nor stayed, the government clearly had a right to remove the aircraft and dispose of it. Finally, my dissent in no way impinges on the activities of federal officials in their war against narcotics importation. I take issue solely with the majority's elimination of the right of appeal.

The majority opinion is disturbing on three different levels. In an important respect it offends fundamental principles of fairness. It also represents a departure from common sense. Finally, it is analytically flawed. Although in some circumstances courts may depart from principles of fairness and common sense, such a departure in this case is unjustified and unsupported by the law of forfeiture and admiralty.

The claimant-appellant was unable to supersede the forfeiture judgment because it lacked the funds to do so. Had it been able to post a supersedeas bond, the appeal would have gone forward without jurisdictional question. Federal law and rules of procedure provide that a judgment may be appealed without any supersedeas bond. Here, however, the claimant is being deprived of that important right because of its impecunious state.

To my mind the egregiousness of the result is magnified because this is a forfeiture case—a penal proceeding wherein strict construction of authorizing statutes has been required almost as long as construction itself. As the Supreme Court stated in another era, when alcohol rather than narcotics was the target of law enforcement: "Forfeitures are not favored; they should be enforced only when within both letter and spirit of the law." United States v. One 1936 Model Ford V-8 De Luxe Coach, 307 U.S. 219, 226, 59 S.Ct. 861, 865, 83 L.Ed. 1249 (1939). Forfeiture actions are unique in that they are the only proceedings where the government may confiscate private property on a mere showing of probable cause. For this court to eliminate the right of appeal, the most important safeguard against abuse, is indeed a drastic step.

I do not assert that such an unfair result is without parallel. I do urge, however, that deprivation of important, indeed fundamental, rights because of impecuniousness alone should rest on compelling imperatives and not on sophistical hair-splitting.

The United States initiated this proceeding in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida and thereby invoked the jurisdiction of a court of the United States. The majority holds that the United States can thereafter take the forfeited chattel out of the district and thereby defeat the jurisdiction of a United States court because of the United States court's inability to enforce a judgment against the United States.

It is not asking too much of courts to suggest that their decisions, whenever possible, should harmonize with ordinary common sense. With deference to my esteemed colleagues in the majority, their decision fails to do so.

The majority's analysis is flawed because the majority misreads binding precedent and misapplies principles of admiralty law in this forfeiture case. Because I believe we have had in personam jurisdiction over the United States from the instant the government invoked the jurisdiction of the federal courts to initiate the forfeiture proceedings, I dissent from the majority's dismissal of this appeal.

As Judge Clark's dissent points out, the majority's reasoning that removal of the res from the district destroyed this court's jurisdiction to hear claimant's appeal is based on a withering legal fiction in admiralty law that personified the ship. The traditional approach conceived of the ship as "the offending thing," which allowed actions directly against the ship. See G. Gilmore & C. Black, The Law of Admiralty 589-94 (2nd ed. 1975). The fiction of a ship's personality began as a literary theme, and reached a height of popularity near the turn of the century. Id. at 616. The fiction has been criticized severely during the past thirty years.[1] The Supreme Court has noted that it has been attacked as archaic, irrational, atavistic and an animistic survival from remote times. Continental Grain Co. v. The Barge FBL-585, 364 U.S. 19, 23, 80 S.Ct. 1470, 1473, 4 L.Ed.2d 1540 (1960).

The majority's resort to this legal fiction as a principle of decision to resolve this appeal is disturbing enough.

1. Since World War II the courts and commentators have been in comfortable agreement that the personification of the ship is and always has been merely a legal fiction, is not and never has been a principle of decision. Abandonment of the fiction would seem to have been a clear gain for legal thought.

G. Gilmore & C. Black, The Law of Admiralty 616 (2nd ed. 1975) (footnote omitted).

See G. Gilmore & C. Black, supra, at 616. But to utilize a defective legal fiction to essentially cut off any right of appeal for appellant is inexcusable. See supra Part 1.

As the doctrine of personification of the ship loses force, so should the rules which rest on it. G. Gilmore & C. Black, supra, at 804-05. Among the many such rules which courts have begun to jettison is the rule that the presence of the res within the jurisdiction of the court is an absolute prerequisite to the court's jurisdiction. See Treasure Salvors, Inc. v. Unidentified Wrecked and Abandoned Sailing Vessel (Treasure Salvors I), 569 F.2d 330, 334 & n. 4 (5th Cir.1978); 7A J. Moore & A. Pelaez, Moore's Federal Practice ¶ E.05, at E-203, E-207 (3rd ed. 1983); see also United States v. An Article of Drug, 725 F.2d 976, 982 (5th Cir. 1984) (in recent years Fifth Circuit has allowed certain in rem actions to continue despite absence of the res); cf. Trans-Asiatic Oil Ltd. v. Apex Oil Co., 804 F.2d 773, 779 (1st Cir.1986) (court's jurisdiction in maritime attachment proceeding is not wholly circumscribed by the presence and amount of the attachment).

The majority compounds the problem by misapplying an already shaky admiralty rule to the facts of this case. The jurisdictional issue in this case involves the United States, not the claimant Leybda. The plaintiff United States, after initially invoking the jurisdiction of the federal courts and then removing the res from the district, now claims lack of subject matter jurisdiction in order to defeat claimant's attempt to appeal to this court. This is the exact opposite of what usually occurs in in rem cases, where the defendant ship stealthily absconds from port and leaves the plaintiff with no res from which to collect.

In the usual in rem case the issue then becomes whether the plaintiff may establish in personam jurisdiction of the owner of the res once the res has been removed from the district. See, e.g., Taylor v. Tracor Marine, Inc., 683 F.2d 1361, 1362 & n. 2 (11th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1012, 103 S.Ct. 1252, 75 L.Ed.2d 481 (1983); Treasure Salvors I, 569 F.2d at 333-35; Inland Credit Corp. v. M/T Bow Egret, 552 F.2d 1148, 1151-52 (5th Cir.1977). In this case the issue is whether the defendant may establish in personam jurisdiction over the instigator of the in rem action, the plaintiff.

The question almost answers itself. Because it is rare that the plaintiff commencing an action in rem turns around and contests the jurisdiction of the court, there is little authority directly on point. In Treasure Salvors I the United States intervened in an action for confirmation of title to the sunken wreck of a 17th Century Spanish vessel. The government also counterclaimed and asserted title to the wreck. The Fifth Circuit held that by intervening in the plaintiff's in rem action and filing a counterclaim asserting a property right in the underwater res, the United States waived the requirement that the res be present in the territorial jurisdiction of the court. 569 F.2d at 335.

In this case the United States has done more than intervene in an existing in rem action. The United States instigated the action.[2] Having submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court, the government should not be allowed to escape "through its subsequent jurisdiction exceptions" to claimant's appeal. Savas v. Maria Trading Corp., 285 F.2d 336, 341 (4th Cir.1960). Indeed in other cases the government has argued successfully that it has personal jurisdiction over the owner of the res even after the res has disappeared. See, e.g., United States v. Articles of Drug, 818 F.2d 569, 571 (7th Cir.1987).

The Fifth Circuit in Inland Credit Corp. faced an almost identical issue. In that case the plaintiff, having received the proceeds of the sale of defendant ship, argued that the court lacked jurisdiction to hear the appeal of two intervenors who were denied a share of the proceeds by the district court. The court rejected the plaintiff's argument, noting that it amounted to the proposition that there can be no appeal from a distribution order once the proceeds have been disbursed. 552 F.2d at 1151. The court explained that it had in personam jurisdiction over the plaintiff because the plaintiff "by his voluntary act in demanding justice from the defendant, submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court. . . ." Id. at 1152 (quoting Adam v. Saenger, 303 U.S. 59, 67-68, 58 S.Ct. 454, 458, 82 L.Ed. 649 (1938)). The United States in this case similarly has submitted itself to the jurisdiction of the court by demanding justice from the defendant in this forfeiture action.[3]

3. The majority misreads the Inland Credit opinion, or at least does not read all of it. The majority reasons that because the plaintiff Inland Credit filed suit both in rem and in personam, the court continued to have jurisdiction over the ship's owner even after the res had been distributed. Therefore, the majority concludes, because the United States

The majority places particular emphasis on L.B. Harvey Marine, Inc. v. M/V "RIVER ARC", 712 F.2d 458 (11th Cir.1983), and Taylor v. Tracor Marine, Inc., 683 F.2d 1361 (11th Cir.1982), cert. denied 460 U.S. 1012, 103 S.Ct. 1252, 75 L.Ed.2d 481 (1983), concluding that these cases "control the result in the case at bar." In addition to the distinguishing features noted in Judge Clark's dissent, I consider it particularly important that the cases relied on by the majority involved the converse of the issue in this case. In Harvey Marine the ship had left the jurisdiction and the plaintiff-appellant was trying to assert jurisdiction over the ship's owners. See 712 F.2d at 458-59. In Taylor the res had been distributed and the plaintiff-appellant was trying to assert a similar jurisdictional claim. 683 F.2d at 1362.[4] Neither case had anything to do with the court's jurisdiction over the plaintiff. Thus these cases are distinguishable, if not wholly inapplicable.[5]

"never invoked in personam jurisdiction [over Leybda, the owner of the airplane] when it brought suit," the court lost jurisdiction once the res was removed from the district.

The issue in this case, however, is not what kind of jurisdiction exists over the defendant owner of the res, but what kind of jurisdiction exists over the plaintiff United States. The sentence quoted by the majority from the Inland Credit opinion does not address this issue. A subsequent sentence does: "[I]t is undeniable that Inland is subject to this Court's in personam jurisdiction." 552 F.2d at 1152.

4. It is actually unclear over what or whom the plaintiff in Taylor was trying assert jurisdiction. The court noted that jurisdiction might still lie had the case involved in personam claims over the ship owner. 683 F.2d at 1362 n. 2.

5. In both Harvey Marine and Taylor the res was literally gone, its location either unknown or its existence terminated. In this case the government has the res and it is sitting in a facility in Missouri.

An admiralty court should not be hampered in its efforts to reach substantial justice by inexorable rules invoked by the parties. Mosher v. Tate, 182 F.2d 475, 479 (9th Cir.1950) (quoting The Minnetonka, 146 F. 509 (2nd Cir.1906)). Admiralty rules should not be construed in a hypertechnical manner to frustrate their adjudicative purpose. Trans-Asiatic Oil, 804 F.2d at 779. The admiralty cases in the Fifth and other circuits are characterized by an "interest in rendering justice rather than an automatistic reliance upon rigid legalisms. . . . " Treasure Salvors I, 569 F.2d at 334.

The majority today violates these principles by resuscitating an anachronistic and conceptually flawed rule of admiralty, and applying it to a modern forfeiture action where it does not belong. I would take this in banc opportunity to rid this circuit of this dated jurisdictional jetsam, and hold that we have jurisdiction to hear this appeal. I therefore dissent.

CLARK, Circuit Judge, dissenting, in which ANDERSON, Circuit Judge, joins:

Through a rigid application of principles to which this court has previously refused to adhere blindly, the court divests itself of jurisdiction in this cause. Binding precedent compels the conclusion that the court is obligated to hear this appeal.

The majority's argument that the court has lost in rem jurisdiction is predicated upon the admiralty fiction that a ship is a person against whom suits can be filed and judgments entered. The admiralty fiction permits actions to be filed against a vessel when the owner cannot be reached with service of process. It also restrains removal of a mobile vessel whose owner might wish to escape payment of debts incurred in port. Even in the admiralty context, however, the vitality of the rule has been questioned. In Continental Grain Company v. The Barge FBL-585, 364 U.S. 19, 23-24, 80 S.Ct. 1470, 1473, 4 L.Ed.2d 1540 (1960), the Supreme Court held that an action which had been brought in rem and in personam could be transferred on forum non conveniens grounds to a district where the action could not have been brought in rem. The Court, explaining the exception it had created, said that "[a] purpose of the fiction, . . . has been to allow actions against ships where a person owning the ship could not be reached, and it can be very useful for this purpose still." But this fiction should not "be transferred into a weapon to defeat that very purpose." This court has previously interpreted Continental Grain as evidencing a Supreme Court preference for the "position that the presence of the res within the district is not an absolute prerequisite to the court's jurisdiction." Treasure Salvors v. Unidentified Wrecked and Abandoned Sailing Vessel, 569 F.2d 330, 334 (5th Cir. 1978), citing with approval, 7A Moore's Federal Practice ¶ E.05 at E203-06 (1977)[1]; G. Gilmore & C. Black, The Law

1. Professor Moore notes that Continental Grain may be persuasive authority for concluding that, with consent of a vessel's owners, in rem process can be effectively served in a district in which the vessel is not physical situated and that consent or a general appearance by the vessel's owner will be sufficient to give the court jurisdiction over the cause.

7A Moore's Federal Practice, ¶ E.05 at E206. See also Reed v. Steamship Yaka, 307 F.2d at 203, 205 (3d Cir.1962) ("voluntary appearance of the claimant to respond to the libel on its merits . . . was an equivalent and equally effective undertaking that its interest in the ship should be subject to the authority of the court") (cited with approval in Treasure Salvors, 569 F.2d at 334.).

of Admiralty 616 (2d ed. 1975).[2]

This view, that the admiralty fiction of personality should not be used to frustrate the adjudication of lawsuits, has been instrumental in the development of exceptions to the traditional admiralty in rem rule in both admiralty and forfeiture cases. As the Fifth Circuit has explained, > in recent years this court [in cases binding on the Eleventh Circuit] has shied away from a strict construction of this in rem rule, and has allowed, in certain circumstances, an in rem action to continue despite the absence of the res. Specifically, we have dispensed with strict application of this in rem rule when a legal fiction which exists solely to effectuate the adjudication of disputes is invoked for the opposite purpose, and we have found a substitute basis of in personam jurisdiction.

United States v. An Article of Drug Consisting of 4,680 Pails, 725 F.2d 976, 982 (5th Cir.1984) (emphasis added).

We first dispensed with strict construction of this in rem rule in Inland Credit Corp. v. M/T Bow Egret, 552 F.2d 1148 (5th Cir.1977), where a ship mortgagee brought suit in rem against the vessel and in personam against its owner to foreclose on its mortgage. Under a court order, the vessel was sold and the proceeds were distributed to various creditors. Two creditors not sharing in the distribution appealed the decision not to include them. As with the claimant in this case, these creditors had failed to seek a stay of execution. Because the res had been distributed, the mortgagee argued that jurisdiction over the matter had been destroyed. Judge Tuttle explained that > a strict construction of the limits of in rem actions might bar any appeal of an in rem action unless supported by continued in rem jurisdiction. This narrow view of our jurisdiction, however, is difficult to square with the modern view, now almost a cliche, that in personam jurisdiction can be asserted whenever the defendant has those minimum contacts with the forum state that will satisfy "'traditional notions of fair play and substantial justice.'"

552 F.2d at 1152. (emphasis added) (citations omitted).[3] While reluctant to decide whether its holding had "critically shaken" the "philosophical underpinnings of the system of in rem jurisdiction in admiralty," the court found that being "at the interface of in rem and in personam jurisdiction" enabled it to "properly exercise a broad in personam power." 552 F.2d at 1152 (citations omitted).

The next case in which this court was presented with such an "interface of in rem and in personam jurisdiction," see An Article of Drug, 725 F.2d at 983, was Treasure Salvors, Inc. v. Unidentified Wrecked and Abandoned Sailing Vessel, 569 F.2d 330 (5th Cir.1978). In Treasure Salvors, a Florida corporation sued for possession of and confirmation of title to a vessel located outside the territorial waters of the United States. The United States, intervenors in the district court, appealed summary judgment in favor of the plaintiffs, arguing that the district court lacked in rem jurisdiction to determine the rights of the parties.

We noted the "common concern of the courts" which had treated related issues "with finding the most practical and efficacious means of resolving disputes before them." We noted further that their decisions demonstrated "[a]n interest in rendering justice rather than an automatistic reliance upon rigid legalisms." 569 F.2d at 334.[4] The court held that although no party had brought an in personam claim, the United States, by intervening in the action as a party defendant/claimant and by stipulating to the district court's admiralty jurisdiction, had "waived the usual requirement that the res be present." Id. at 335.

In a more recent case, decided under the seizure and forfeiture component of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act, 21 U.S.C. § 301 et seq., the Fifth Circuit again held that in personam jurisdiction over the parties existed even though no party had filed an in personam claim. An

4. The court referred to these decisions: Continental Grain, supra (action brought in personam and in rem could be transferred on forum non conveniens grounds to district where no in rem jurisdiction existed); Steamship Yaka, supra (voluntary appearance by claimant resulted in waiver of the requirement that the res be present); Booth Steamship Co. v. Tug Dalzell No. 2, 1966 A.M.C. 2615 (S.D.N.Y.1966) (even though res was absent from district, claimant submitted vessel to court's jurisdiction by filing claim, alleging vessel's presence, and making a general appearance). See also The Fairisle, 76 F.Supp. 27, 34 (D.Md.1947) (vessel owners appearing in in rem action to contest plaintiff's claim "may be equitably treated as if they had been brought into court by personal process"), cited with approval in Mosher v. Tate, 182 F.2d 475 (9th Cir.1950).

Article of Drug, supra. The United States sought the forfeiture of a drug that it claimed had not met the requirements specified by the Act. Upon judgment for the drug's manufacturer, which had intervened as a claimant, the United States Marshal released the drug to the manufacturer.[5] The United States, although it had not requested a stay of execution or an order seeking return of the res, filed a motion for a new trial which was granted. The manufacturer moved to dismiss the complaint for lack of in rem jurisdiction following the removal of the drug from the district; this motion was denied. The United States' motion for summary judgment in the new trial was granted.

The Fifth Circuit explained that Treasure Salvors and Inland Credit permit the court to find a "substitute basis of in personam jurisdiction" when the fiction of personality is invoked for a purpose inconsistent with its true purpose, namely, the adjudication of lawsuits. 725 F.2d at 982. The "substitute basis" of in personam jurisdiction stemmed primarily from the fact that, after the release of the res, the manufacturer voluntarily appeared before the district court for a number of reasons, including its opposition to the government's motion for a new trial. Id. at 984.

Here, the facts are much the same. On October 21, 1985, seventeen days after the government took the plane to Missouri, it filed various papers in the district court, including a memorandum opposing Leybda's motion for a new trial. Under the majority's and the government's view, the government should have argued that removal of the res destroyed the district court's jurisdiction. Indeed, under this view, the government was not entitled to receive a new trial in An Article of Drug. The government cannot have it both ways. Here, the government's continued participation in post-judgment and post-removal proceedings further supports the conclusion that a substitute basis of in personam jurisdiction exists in this case. An Article of Drug, 725 F.2d at 984.

5. Although the drug was released in violation of the automatic ten-day stay provision of Fed.R.Civ.P. 62(a), this was not a factor in the court's decision.

As the facts in An Article of Drug show, a strict adherence to the government's position would lead to absurd results. The district court did not lose its power to order a new trial even though the aircraft was no longer in the jurisdiction. Indeed, by opposing Leybda's motion for a new trial without challenging the court's jurisdiction, the government recognized the court's continuing jurisdiction and its power to order the return of the aircraft. The majority acknowledges that An Article of Drug is factually indistinguishable from this case, yet declines to follow it because "precedent in this Circuit does not support [its] holding." Maj. op. at n. 5. A careful review of An Article Drug demonstrates plainly that it is well supported by prior decisions which are binding on this court. The majority simply refuses to acknowledge the substantial limitations which this court, and others, have placed on the traditional in rem rule. Having voluntarily invoked the jurisdiction of the district court, the government cannot complain about remaining subject to this court's jurisdiction for all purposes that justice requires. Adam v. Saen- ger, 303 U.S. 59, 67-68, 58 S.Ct. 454, 458, 82 L.Ed. 649 (1938), quoted in Inland Credit, 552 F.2d at 1152.[6]

The majority relies on two recent decisions of this court, L. B. Harvey Marine, Inc. v. M/V River Arc, 712 F.2d 458 (11th Cir.1983), and Taylor v. Tracor Marine, Inc., 683 F.2d 1361 (11th Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1012, 103 S.Ct. 1252, 75 L.Ed.2d 481 (1983), in which we applied the traditional admiralty in rem rule. In both these cases, we dismissed as moot admiralty appeals because the vessels in question were no longer within the court's jurisdiction. Both cases are distinguishable. In Harvey Marine, a ship was arrested by the district court pursuant to a creditor's claim of a maritime lien. After a post-seizure hearing, the court dissolved the warrant of arrest. The ship, which had been scheduled to leave port on the same day the court dissolved the warrant, did so. We dismissed the appeal because no court could "proceed to adjudication" once the vessel had left the territorial jurisdiction. 712 F.2d at 459. The vessel's departure was due to the dissolution of the arrest warrant, not any act of the parties.

In Taylor, crew members brought an action in rem against a vessel to obtain payment of past wages. The vessel was sold and the proceeds were distributed to priority lienholders. We dismissed the claim as moot since the res was no longer in the jurisdiction. We noted, however, that if the case had "also involved claims in personam, jurisdiction might still lie." 683 F.2d at 1362 n. 2 (citing Treasure Salvors, supra, and Inland Credit Corp., supra). Here, because we are "presented with an interface of in rem and in personam jurisdiction," An Article of Drug, 725 F.2d at 983, and because the government is retaining exclusive possession of the plane, Taylor and Harvey Marine do not apply.

6. The majority's elaborate effort to distinguish Adam v. Saenger is totally unavailing. Inland Credit did not cite Adam for its holding, but for the equitable principle that a party cannot, under a given set of circumstances—here the absence of the res—acknowledge a court's jurisdiction and then, without a change in these circumstances, contend that the court's jurisdiction has vanished. That this court has fully adopted such a principle is clear from the discussion in Treasure Salvors.

The majority also relies on those cases that hold it is "incumbent upon [claimant] to obtain a stay of the district court's judgment if he desired to preserve jurisdiction for an appeal." United States v. $57,480.05 United States Currency, 722 F.2d 1457, 1549 (9th Cir.1984); see also United States v. 66 Pieces of Jade And Gold Jewelry, 760 F.2d 970, 973 (9th Cir.1985). We relied on similar cases in Harvey Marine, but only to conclude that where the traditional admiralty in rem rule does apply, it does not work to deny fundamental fairness to the complaining party. 712 F.2d at 459. The presence of the substitute basis of in personam jurisdiction is sufficient to distinguish these cases.

Yet a rigid application of Fed.R.Civ.P. 62's provisions poses substantial problems if the court refuses to acknowledge the presence of in personam jurisdiction. In other types of proceedings, when a judgment for property is rendered, the losing party has a choice. He need not post a bond. He can still appeal the judgment. If he wins on appeal, he can bring an action to recover his property or its value. The rule established by the court today enables the United States to defeat the right to appeal a forfeiture judgment for mobile property if the losing party has insufficient funds to post a bond. Where the subject property is a jet aircraft, the security required to post such a bond is no small sum. The harshness of the Circuit's new rule is fully demonstrated in this case where as the government acknowledged, "Leybda ha[d] no assets other than the Lear Jet." United States' Mem. in Opp. to Claimant's Motion for Attorney's Fees and Costs, Rec. Vol. 10, Tab 352 at 5 n. 1.

I respectfully dissent.

EDMONDSON, Circuit Judge, dissenting:

The idea that, when a plaintiff comes into a court system requesting the courts' assistance in resolving a case, the plaintiff submits its person to the jurisdiction of those courts until the case in finally concluded seems to me to be neither innovative nor unfair. I agree with Judge Vance when he says that "we have had in personam jurisdiction over the United States from the instant the government invoked the jurisdiction of the federal courts to initiate the forfeiture proceeding." I would affirm the judgment of the District Court.
